

Airing an anti-Kerry documentary right before the election to twenty-four percent of US voters is a gross misuse of public airwaves. This is an extreme example of the dangers of media consolidation by corporations and should not be allowed. The airwaves are free and Sinclair is obliged by law to serve public interest. This is a disgrace to democracy and should not be allowed. The only way such a program should be allowed to air, is if a second program, like the film, Going Upriver, is aired as well, and at an equally strategic time, just before the election.
